Theyll start at our coming, The young chieftain said, As he reined in his steed, With his hand on his blade. Ho! speed on, brave Roland, To the tower by the sea, The half of my spearmen Will follow with thee; Stop not at the Abbey, But speedily pass; What care we for penance, Priests, prayers, or mass! Then hie through the forest To deep flowing Doon, And we oer the dark moor Will meet with thee soon. The young chieftain spurred on His swift, gallant grey, E And through brake and forest He bounded away; Ere midnight he halted By Doons crystal wave--With his silver bugle Three loud blasts he gave: The signal is answered, And soon by his side, All harnessed for battle, His bold spearmen ride. Ho! Roland, thou quickly Hast sped on thy way: How fared thou at Turnberry? Tell me, I pray. We sacked the strong fortlet, The warder we slew, And startled the English With our wild halloo; They follow! they follow! As swift as the wind; Their chargers are neighing And prancing behind. Speed onward, and harry Green Barbieston glen; Take the beeves from the lea, The sheep from the pen; Through the path in the moor Drive the booty away; On the green hill of Hadyet Encamp with your prey; Here, with my brave spearmen, Awhile Ill remain, To meet with the Saxon And his warrior train. On his silver bugle Three shrill blasts he blew, That, far off at sea, scared The slumbering seamew; And deep in the forest The loud echoes rung, As he shouted his war-cry, And gallantly sprung Through brake and deep morass, With his hardy men, To meet with the Saxons Adown in the glen. Theres noise in the forest, Heard far in the night, For the outlaws and Saxons Are clo...
